
Blake Bridgers

Southlake, TX • (682) 300-6828 • blake.bridgers2@outlook.com • linkedin.com/in/blakebridgers

Dear Hiring Manager,

I have learned over 9 plus years in B2B SaaS that when enterprise clients churn, it is usually due to the failure to monitor health indicators, perform business reviews, or convert unaddressed adoption gaps into opportunities for expansion. This type of work is where I thrive — as a trusted strategic advisor transforming at-risk accounts into successful expansion stories.

At Yooz, I was able to see this happening firsthand. Post-implementation, many clients were experiencing low utilization of their platform capabilities and/or were at risk of non-renewal, with users expressing frustration. I collaborated with the engineering and operations teams to develop our first structured onboarding program segmented by module complexity and user roles. The results were: 30% faster time-to-value, better health metrics across my portfolio, and $3.75M of retained and expanded revenue. In addition, while working at HPE and Dell EMC, I managed over $23M in portfolios and conducted executive-level business reviews with C-suite stakeholders and identified white space opportunities through solution-based discovery.

Here is what prompted my desire for this position: I had been in high-performance sales for almost a decade and had reached a crossroad. While I enjoyed the strategic relationship management, the business reviews, the C-suite relationships, the problem-solving, etc., I could no longer sustain the constant pressure of net new acquisitions in the long term. As such, I intentionally stepped back and began to explore what I truly wanted next. To keep my skills sharp, I took on some consulting work and worked seasonally in an operational capacity to gain experience with customer service from different angles. Through this exploration, I gained complete clarity: Customer Success Executive positions are the perfect combination of the two areas I am best at, namely relationship management and strategic thinking, while providing a sustainable, partnership-driven model for delivering value realization. I will no longer be exploring. I am "all-in" on Customer Success leadership and believe this Corrigo position is the exact right fit for me.

What draws me to JLL specifically is your leadership in the digital transformation of the facilities management industry. When operational efficiencies exist in this area, they positively affect worker satisfaction, cost savings and business results; all of which have very real stakes but deliver very real impact. I know how to serve as the Voice of the Customer, how to coordinate cross-functional efforts around complex integrations and migrations, and most importantly, how to use data to identify risk before it turns into churn.

Over the first 90 days of my employment with Corrigio, I plan to focus on three items: (1) determine the current state of portfolio health and identify any at-risk customers, (2) begin deploying strategic business reviews that tie to each client's specific KPIs and objectives, and (3) create an expansion pipeline by identifying opportunities where increased adoption and/or solution expansion produce measurable ROI.

I would appreciate the opportunity to discuss how my past performance history, along with my commitment to Customer Success as my career path forward, can help further the goals of Corrigio and JLL in terms of growth and client satisfaction.

Best regards,

Blake E. Bridgers